Multipanel promotes less wastage through a quirky bathroom design tip for retailers and installers.

Multipanel, the UK's leading wall panel brand, is on a drive to help KBB retailers and installers of its panels reduce waste.

As an increasing number of homeowners turn to bathroom wall panels over tiles, Multipanel is educating its customers on how turning to a clever design trick can mean a significant reduction in offcuts going to waste.

As well as being able to be used on walls, the company's panels can also be used as bath panels, as well as creating a ledge around the top of the bath for a sunken effect. By doing so, it not only reduces waste, but provides homeowners with a cost-effective way of jazzing up a standard bath.

Multipanel is a company that is committed to its environmental credentials, as its products are manufactured in the UK using Forest Stewardship Council® (FSC® C128180) certified materials and are 100% recyclable. The company also recycles 99% of their post-production waste, reducing landfill and contributing to the circular economy.

How to install:

- Installers should build a wooden frame of battens for the panel to sit against
- The frame should be fitted under the bath to allow a gap of 11mm for the rear of the bath panel to sit against the frame and the finished side of the panel to be flush with the lip of the bath
- Installers should measure the distance between the finished floor surface and the underside of the top of the bath and cut the panel accordingly. If using 2 or 3 panel off-cuts, click them together to form the bath panel
- Offer up the new bath panel and make any final adjustments if necessary
- Fix into place with either screws or a small amount of adhesive to allow for removal and access to pipework for future repairs/maintenance
